Red buckets brought in a lot of green across the Great White Way and beyond. During the spring Red Buckets fundraising season, theatergoers donated a “record-shattering” $6.8 million for hundreds of HIV programs, food banks, health clinics, mental health centers and housing programs across the country, reports Broadway Cares/Equity Fights AIDS, which spearheads the campaign and distributes funds through its national grants program.

Broadway Cares also announced the title and theme of its annual burlesque bonanza, Broadway Bares: Come Out Come Out. The Sunday, June 22, jaw-dropping striptacular promises to deliver wicked fun that’ll inspire Oz and ahhs alike.

This year’s Red Buckets fundraising total of $6,849,510 beat the previous record of $6,594,778 set in 2019. During the six-week campaign, audiences donate money in the iconic red collection buckets that cast members hold after the show. In exchange for donations, theater fans can also procure autographed posters, Playbills and unique memorabilia and props. This spring, 57 theaters—including Broadway, off-Broadway and national touring companies—participated in the Red Buckets campaign and challenge.

“I was bowled over by the impassioned and often deeply personal appeals from the stage,” Broadway Cares/Equity Fights AIDS executive director Danny Whitman said. “This heartfelt and inspiring energy prompted extraordinary generosity from audiences to help at a time when so many are facing their darkest days. As many of the organizations we support face unimaginable challenges caused by uncertain funding, it’s reassuring to know that Broadway Cares supporters once again stand strong in providing compassionate hope and help for millions across the country.”
